

Governmental Emergency Powers and the Constitutional Implications Arising from Pandemic Orders

CE2009GEP

Thursday, September 10th | 1-2pm Eastern

Description

In the wake of the unprecedented global pandemic, every level of government has taken steps to address the public health crisis. These steps have manifested in orders which impact businesses and individuals alike including quarantine orders, travel restrictions, occupancy limitations, and restrictions on movement. This is not the first pandemic, nor the first national crisis, faced by the United States. There have been several lawsuits filed challenging the constitutionality of the COVID-19 orders, including challenges based on the right to travel, the right to associate, the right to free exercise of religion, and other federal and state constitutional provisions.

This panel of litigation practitioners will provide the constitutional and statutory context for governmental emergency powers, then will identify how those principles inform an analysis of the Covid-19 orders. The panel will discuss the lawsuits challenging the orders and the current jurisprudence.
